Labour should look to Cameron, not Blair, for inspiration as it chooses its new leader

Despite the party’s 2019 defeat, Labour’s policies have much popular appeal and could demand majority support. This means that the new Labour leader should not reinvent the party and its message, like the root and branch reform that took place under Tony Blair, but rather change its image, like David Cameron ‘detoxified’ the Tories, writes Sean Kippin.

Few corpses will be better examined than Labour’s following the 2019 General Election. The emerging narrative is fairly conclusive; Labour lost because of its leadership. The party found itself on the wrong side of enough of its traditional supporters over Brexit to cause serious problems in key seats and regions. This was compounded by losing a lot of its Remain-oriented supporters to the Liberal Democrats and the Green Party. The less said about Scotland the better. Underpinning all of this was a sense that Labour’s promises were too big and to be considered credible, particularly when they were to be delivered by the current leadership.

In 1994, with the creation of New Labour, the party reached the final stages of a process that had been underway since 1983 when Neil Kinnock assumed its leadership. Slowly, he disentangled the party from the direct control of the trade unions and the radical left, and moderated its policy offer. Blair took this to the next stage, relabelling the party, and seeking to create virtue out of necessity in enthusiastically embracing centrist. In between, John Smith had overseen consequential internal reforms which gave the leadership and the Parliamentary Labour Party greater independence from its affiliates. The overall result was a comprehensive reshaping of the party, and therefore the sole viable vehicle for British social democracy. It has been suggested that the next Labour leader embark on a similar journey today, reforming the party internally, pursuing doggedly centrist policy positions, and striking a more overtly traditional and patriotic tone. Yet what is required of Labour following its latest electoral nadir is not as dramatic. David Cameron’s Conservatives, in the period from 2005 to 2015, showed that electoral success can be built upon only a modest set of policy changes when combined with a skilful playing of the political game. It goes without saying that the parallels between 1983’s Labour and today are not exact, not least because 1983’s party featured a large Trotskyite faction which was hostile to democratic governance and many of the values of the Labour Party.

So what can the new Labour leader do to enhance their party’s chances of sufficiently improving their performance at the next election. A good place to start is on striking a reassuring tone on high-profile issues which act as a proxy for patriotism. Britain’s nuclear deterrent, despite its overwhelming pointlessness, isn’t going anywhere. The new Leader should embrace renewal. This can be justified on two grounds: firstly, it creates and supports jobs in traditional Labour areas; secondly, now that Brexit – and the diminishment of international standing that goes with it – will happen, a statement that Britain seeks to retain its status as a global player will stand as a useful symbol of the new Leader’s ‘seriousness’ and ‘patriotism’.

Harold Wilson famously observed that as Leader of the Opposition he quickly ‘ran out of things to say’. The Prime Minister can pull myriad levers to project their party and government’s message and to change policy, while all the Leader of the Opposition has is his or her words. One exception to this is internal party reform. In different ways, this allowed Opposition leaders to ‘cut through’ and put their policies into concrete form. For Kinnock, Smith, and Blair (and to a lesser extent Duncan Smith and Cameron) this involved picking fights with elements of their own party. The new Leader could do the same. The apposite topic for this is antisemitism. No other form of racism would be tolerated to the same extent, and that a number of antisemites arrive at this perspective via advocacy for the Palestinian people is a complete irrelevance. The new Leader should adopt a stance so tough that it not only expels those who have expressed antisemitic sentiments, but that it also dissuades anyone of that poisonous mindset from joining the party in the first place. There is no upside, justification, or benefit to having racists in the Labour Party.
This would also help the party with its problems on leadership more broadly. Alas, Labour now has to play this game, again. Its new Leader must embody normality and convention in both associations and appearance. They must embrace media appearances and not allow themselves to be victimised by the media more generally. ‘It’s all so unfair’ is a terrible look, and projects weakness. They must also not allow themselves to be drowned by events. For example, any observer of British politics since 2016 could see that Labour was going to end up backing a second referendum on EU membership; the underlying conditions made it inevitable. Corbyn’s mistake was to not acknowledge it, to wait too long, and in doing so to avoid laying the groundwork for the inevitable U-turn.

None of this is to suggest that Labour’s policy offer needs to change in any meaningful sense, particularly on the domestic front. Taxes on the super-rich remain popular; a shift towards a new model of ownership in the private sector remains popular; professionally-led public services remain popular; infrastructure improvement remains popular; alleviating poverty, lowering the country’s carbon emissions, fairer business practices, more and better housing, and state enforced higher wages all remain popular. Much of it is necessary. Just as consequentially, the Labour membership is highly unlikely to elect anyone who thinks otherwise. Therefore, the new Leader’s task is to strike a reassuring tone and appearance, and to find a way to sell and justify a set of policies and beliefs which represent the settled will of the Labour Party in a more savvy, skilful, and reassuring manner. It also needs to settle on one or two of the most popular to highlight, rather than presenting a smorgasbord of new nationalisations and spending cuts.

The party’s binds on Scottish independence and Brexit, which weren’t designed to drive wedges between the party and many of its traditional supporters, but may as well have been, haven’t gone away because of the 2019 election. They will continue to dominate politics on both sides of the border – probably to Labour’s detriment. However, its only hope given the settled beliefs of the membership is on seeking to shift the conversation towards policy issues, and to fight for the next five years on that terrain. What needs to change is not so much the message but the messenger and the way the message is delivered.

Upon becoming Conservative leader in 2005, David Cameron observed that when focus groups heard Conservative policies they agreed with them, but disagreed once they found out that it was the Conservatives that had proposed them. This is why his strategy was to ‘detoxify’ the Tories, rather than embark on a New Labour-style root and branch reform. What needed to change was not the policies, but the image of the organisation and its most high profile spokesperson proposing them.

None of this stopped the Conservative Party in 2010 privatising public assets, cutting taxes, restricting immigration, and reducing social security entitlements. Much of it was far more radical in nature than public opinion appreciates. When it returned to power in 2015, in control of a majority government, it organised a referendum on Britain’s EU membership. Detoxification masked the party’s true and enduring nature. Labour’s policies today have a large amount of appeal, and could demand majority support and win the party enough votes to return to power. The party does not need a wholesale reinvention, but it does now need something akin to a detoxification.
