

Should broadcasters credit newspapers when they follow up on their scoops?

The Times had this 'world exclusive' today. It's a cracking story. It seems the British Museum think it's ok to loan the Parthenon Marbles to Putin's Russia, but won't consider letting the Greeks have them back.

World Exclusive

The carving of the river god Ilissos in the Hermitage in St Petersburg yesterday after its journey from the British Museum. The artwork is on loan to celebrate the Russian museum's 250th anniversary

Elgin Marbles moved out of Britain for first time

● Secret journey to Russia of Greek masterpiece ● Sculpture to be unveiled today in St Petersburg

Ben Howle St Petersburg century by Lord Elgin, the British de East. In this case there were "two sets of the collection is available to travel, "the politics had looked very uncer-

Very sensibly the BBC followed up on the story. In fact they led with it on their flagship morning radio news show, the Today Programme. But unless I missed it, I don't think the broadcasters mentioned the source of the story [UPDATE; I DID miss it – Justin Webb gave the Times a credit and read a quote from their story at 6.09am]. And the online version also failed to credit the Times.

5 December 2014 Last updated at 08:58

1.6K

Share

Elgin Marbles: British Museum loans statue to Russia

In fact at the bottom of the online version are a number of links to newspaper versions of the story. But these are generated automatically by a separate company and for some reason their algorithm didn't select the Times to link to:

"The Newstracker system is automated. The BBC does not censor or change the results. But because there can potentially be scores of sites covering each story, the BBC does define some rules (algorithms) that help define which sites we link to at any point in time – and in what order these links appear. In general, our rules tend to give greater weight to national and international sources over regional or local ones. We have a policy of only linking to English-language sites. The results are sorted in date order to provide the most recent stories at the top."

I don't think the BBC should be forced to credit newspapers all the time. You would end up like those American medical adverts where all the terms and conditions and possible side effect warnings have to be read out very quickly every time. In this case the British Museum had put out a press release over night so in that sense the story was 'out'. And newspapers are much, much worse at not crediting each other or broadcasters.

But it does seem to me that for a public service broadcaster it would be polite, transparent and helpful if they did credit more often on air and online. I think it is useful for the public to know where stories come from and in general I think it supports journalism to acknowledge other people's good work. I think this was one of those Times. (geddit?)

[UPDATE: I am pushing at an open door here – a BBC spokesperson got back to me to say this:

“We do aim to credit sources where appropriate and possible, whilst also making it clear when it is our own original journalism. Each story will be judged on a case by case basis by the editorial team responsible for the output. We've said recently that we can and will do more to link to stories where suitable.”

- Copyright © 2014 London School of Economics and Political Science