

-
- Home   About   Latest   Books by Discipline   Books by Region   Bookshop Guides
- Upcoming Events   Features  
-

Book Review: Women and Power in Postconflict Africa by Aili Mari Tripp

In Women and Power in Postconflict Africa, Aili Mari Tripp provocatively argues that major conflict can have disruptive, egalitarian effects, catalysing women's increased legislative representation. She demonstrates how conflict has often pushed women into socially valued domains, where they demonstrate their equal abilities and thereby undermine prevailing gender ideologies. Alice Evans explores the theoretical insights of this important scholarship, arguing that the book sheds light on much broader processes of egalitarian social change common to the Global North and South alike.

Women and Power in Postconflict Africa*. Aili Mari Tripp. Cambridge University Press. 2015.

Civil wars unleash untold trauma, tear communities apart, destroy infrastructure, stall economic growth ... yet are somehow good for gender equality? Thus argues Aili Mari Tripp. In stark contrast to mainstream portrayals of women as victims, Women and Power in Postconflict Africa illustrates that postconflict African countries typically exhibit higher levels of female representation. Why is this?

---

Recent

Book Review: Contentious Politics
by Charles

Drawing on rigorous cross-national analysis undertaken with Melanie Hughes as well as rich and in-depth studies of Uganda, Liberia and Angola, Tripp argues that conflicts pushed women into masculine, socially valued roles. They became fighters, breadwinners and leaders in peace movements. Prolonged exposure to women demonstrating their equal competence in these roles led people to question gender ideologies. Women increasingly came to perceive themselves as capable, strong and autonomous. This attitudinal shift cultivated growing support for women leaders in parliaments, executive branches, government bureaucracies, judiciaries and civil society.

However, conflict is not in itself transformative. Women's movements have played a key role in pressing for egalitarian reforms in postconflict countries. Their influence appears mediated by the national and international context. At the national level, transitions to multipartyism in the early 1990s greatly expanded the political space for feminist lobbying. But authoritarian restrictions remain in some postconflict African countries, such as Angola (where executive power is reinforced by substantial oil and diamond wealth).

The 1990s also heralded a shift in global and regional norms, with greater support for women's rights. This appears to have compounded pressure on national governments to enact more equitable laws and policies. Curiously, however, there is no apparent correlation between foreign aid (either general or gender-focused) and female representation. A damning indictment of donor interventions? Or are international influences primarily normative, rather than financial?

Tilly and Sidney
Tarrow

January 5th, 2016

Book Review: Networks of Outrage and Hope:
Social Movemen in the Internet
Age by Manuel
Castells

January 4th, 2016

The Monthly
Roundup:
What Have You Been Reading in December
2015?

January 4th, 2016

What Have You Been Reading in 2015
on LSE Review of Books?

December 22nd,
2015

Recommen dation
Festive Reads
from LSE
Review

Image Credit: Tawakkul Karman, Leymah Gbowee and Ellen Johnson Sirleaf display their awards during the presentation of the Nobel Peace Prize, 10 December 2011 (Harry Wad)

The disruptive, egalitarian effects of major conflicts are not unique to Africa. In the United States, Britain, Germany and Austria, women won the right to vote following World War I after working as nurses, munitions workers and bus drivers. Neutral Switzerland delayed universal suffrage until 1971. By highlighting these global parallels, transcending stifling siloes of research in the Global North and South, Tripp enables us to see and learn from common processes of egalitarian social change.

I actually think Tripp could go further here in drawing out theoretical insights with global relevance. The disruptive, egalitarian effects of conflicts parallel dynamics relating to female labour force participation. Across the world, neoliberal economic restructuring appears to have triggered a shift in perceived interests. As median male wages fell (from $41,000 in 1973 to $23,000 in 2013 in the US, for instance), families increasingly came to regard women's employment as advantageous. Prolonged exposure to women demonstrating their equal competence in socially valued, masculine domains appears to have undermined gender ideologies, catalysing growing support for women leaders. Both major conflict and long-term financial hardship appear to act as critical junctures, enabling a shift in perceived interests, growing flexibility in gendered divisions of labour and attitudinal change in turn.

Such parallels can actually be found in Tripp's preceding work in Tanzania. While African women are commonly portrayed as of Books!

(Part Two)

December 22nd,
2015

Log In

To use Facebook's social login you must switch from Facebook as LSE Review of Books to Facebook as Rosie Dealer.

unappreciated 'shock absorbers' of structural adjustment (undertaking both paid work and unpaid care work), Tripp illustrated how Tanzanian women's market work greatly enhanced their self-esteem and social respect.

Going forward with Tripp's analysis of egalitarian disruptions (through conflict and economic hardship), I would be keen to see greater discussion of positive feedback loops and ideological change. For herein lies an apparent inconsistency. Tripp's premise is that women's performances of socially valued roles during conflict shifted their gendered self-perceptions. Ugandan women came to 'express themselves as autonomous and capable rather than as vulnerable and dependent'. Curiously, however, cross-national Afrobarometer data indicate that 'postconflict countries exhibit [...] less support for women as leaders'. Does this undermine Tripp's argument?

I think not. While at first glance the quantitative data appear inconsistent with the causal mechanisms posited, they can be made compatible. Reading Tripp's in-depth descriptions of Liberia and Uganda, it occurs to me that conflict pushed some (but not all) women to undertake socially valued economic and leadership roles. By realising their strengths and importance, those women came to broaden their horizons and aspire for political office. Furthermore, through collective organising, such women spearheaded egalitarian reforms, and were increasingly supported by male colleagues. But such changes were not universal. Going beyond the data presented in Tripp's book, we might speculate that some Ugandans were not exposed to flexibility in gendered divisions of labour and thus remained sceptical of women's equal competence. But over time, with greater exposure to women in leadership roles in postconflict countries, I would anticipate higher rates of support. And indeed this is reflected in the most recent (2015) round of Afrobarometer data. In postconflict Burundi, Namibia and Uganda (though not Liberia, which lacks gender quotas), support for women's leadership has increased over time. This indicates the power of postconflict gender quotas to enable symbolic representation and a positive feedback loop. Thus Tripp was right all along.

Tweets

 LSE Review of Books
@LSEReviewBooks

Democratic Dashboard are hi part-time Comms Officer for Feb-May 2016 elections - dea
18 Jan ow.ly/WGUgk

 LSE Review of Books
@LSEReviewBooks

Review: Contentious Politics b
Charles Tilly and Sidney Tarro
@OUPAcademic ow.ly/WE6R
pic.twitter.com/hRRpXNaoCt

Tweet to @LSEReviewBook

Funded by HEIF 5

Archives

Archives

Select Month

Besides exploring attitudinal change over time, we also need to examine the politics of implementation. Tripp largely focuses on legislative and constitutional changes. Postconflict countries consistently outperform on these indicators. For instance, 75% of postconflict Sub-Saharan African countries have legislation around violence against women, as compared to 50% of their non-postconflict comparators. But, as Tripp explicitly recognises, 'more research is needed into the actual implementation of these laws'. I repeat this not to question Tripp's hypothesis, but rather to pinpoint key drivers of egalitarian social change. If gender-based violence (GBV) laws have been neither well-funded nor impacted cultural expectations, prevalence or prosecutions, it may be that they were merely designed to feign egalitarian concern. If so, how might we increase accountability for implementation? How can women's movements in postconflict countries ensure that their national-level victories materialise in district-level practice?

I look forward to Tripp's future pioneering work in this field. Women and Power in Postconflict Africa is everything one might hope for: rigorously researched (in-depth qualitative, process-tracing complemented by cross-national regressions), highlighting global parallels and theoretically significant.

---

Dr Alice Evans is a Lecturer in Human Geography at the University of Cambridge. You can follow her on Twitter @\_alice\_evans

---

Related

Recommended

The Monthly

Book Review:

Festive Reads from LSE Review of Books! (Part Two)

In "Africa and the Middle East"

Roundup: What Have You Been Reading in December 2015?

In "Alice Evans"

Women, Power
and Politics in 21st Century Iran by

Tara Povey and
Elaheh Rostami-
Povey

In "Africa and the Middle East"

---

December 9th, 2015 | Africa and the Middle East, Alice Evans, Cambridge University Press, Development Studies book reviews,

Gender and Sexuality Studies book reviews, Politics book

reviews | 1 Comment

---

---

◀ Previous post

Next post ▶

---

One Comment

---

LSE Business Review – Women and Power in Postconflict Africa – Book Review
12/13/2015 at 7:32 am - Reply

[...] This article was originally published in the LSE Review of Books blog. [...]

---

Leave A Comment

---

Name (required)

Email (required)

Website

Comment...

POST COMMENT

- ☐ Notify me of follow-up comments by email.
- ☐ Notify me of new posts by email.

Visit our sister
blog: the LSE
British Politics and Policy Blog

Visit our sister
blog: the LSE USA
Politics and Policy blog

Visit our sister
blog: the LSE
Impact of Social Sciences Blog

Copyright 2013 LSE Review of Books

This work by LSE Review of Books is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-NonCommercial-NoDerivs 2.0 UK: England & Wales.

3