

When ‘Do No Harm’ Hurts

Professor David Keen, Professor of Complex Emergencies at LSE, writes for The New York Times:

LONDON — IT’S increasingly clear that humanitarian assistance to rebel-held areas of Syria is being impeded by a fear — shared by the United States, the European Commission and many nongovernmental organizations — that food, medicine and other supplies might fall into the hands of terrorists.

Read the full article here.

November 8th, 2013 | News from the Department, Topical and Comment | 0 Comments

⌵